Customer Reviews

When Time-Life first published its series, Foods of the World, it fell right in step with what people like Julia Child and Irma and Marion Rombauer (see the 1973 edition of The Joy of Cooking) were doing for American cooking: opening our eyes (and mouths) to fabulous food, introducing us to the luscious cuisines and enlightening cooking methods of cultures all around the globe. One of the other great delights of these cookbooks was the choice of authors commissioned to write them. Time-Life called upon the talents of wonderful writers like Peter Feibleman, playwright, essayist, and sometimes-lover/sometimes-collaborator of Lillian Hellman's to write The Cooking of Spain and Portugal. (Feibleman was co-author of Hellman's last book, Eating Together, which one should read for the writing as much as for the recipes therein.) Feibleman often lived in Spain, and he grasped its various cultures well. He took the time, both as a lover of good food and a lover of a good story, to learn the history of traditional dishes and the various regions from which each came. He brings the settings of the cuisines to life, explaining for example, the history of Gazpacho, which comes originally from the breathtakingly hot region of Andalusia. "If there is a single key to the quality of the Andalusian kitchen, it is lightness," he writes. "In the blistering, sun-steeped cities...food must be so lacking in heaviness and so easily digestible as hardly to appear to be food." He goes on to describe Gazpacho: ...Andalusian's food must somehow exist under the ponderous southern sun without wilting. It seems a conglomeration of nothing...for Andalusian dishes like Andalusian jokes do not bear heavy scrutiny.
